

If you fail to plan, you plan to fail.

The occupational health and safety risk arena has become increasingly difficult to manage due to large expansion, multi- locations, technological advancements and an increased need in higher productivity. Due to these factors the risk manager has a very daunting task; some would say an impossible task to conduct and this is where human error slips in. A vigilant employer will have identified this problem but what can be done to alleviate the everyday pressure that leads to those unplanned and unforeseen incidents?

Another topic for discussion is the ever increasing compliance requirements and the liability faced by directors and owners in the event of an incident or death. The more stringent rules and regulations will put those who have the ability to make decisions in the spotlight. If you fail to plan, you plan to fail and this couldn't ring more true for the occupational health and safety environment. Owners, employers and directors need to make the right decisions and put the necessary in to place to make sure their people are empowered, profits are protected and that they go beyond compliance to introduce a new risk management culture into their company.
